

CONTENTS

- Executive Summary .....4
- I. Introduction.....12
- II. The Context for the Discussion .....14
- III. Several Factors are Driving the Widespread Demand for Reform.....16
  - 1. A collective “infrastructure epiphany” has arisen about the need to reinvest in America’s aging and outdated transportation network .....16
  - 2. The movement of people within and between metropolitan areas has become challenging due to ever-present traffic congestion and unconnected modes.....20
  - 3. The interstate and intermodal movement of goods is projected to get more difficult .....26
  - 4. There is growing concern about a “perfect storm” of environmental and energy sustainability, and the role transportation plays.....29
  - 5. A large portion of the American workforce is concerned about the size of household spending on transportation-related items—such as gasoline.....33
  - 6. Finally, amid these transportation-related challenges, worries around transportation funding and finance dominate .....36

- IV. Transportation, the U.S. Economy and the Metropolitan Priority .....42
- V. The Policy Problem: Federal Transportation Policy is Absent, Outdated, and Underperforming.....46
  - 1. First, for the vast majority of the program the federal government is absent when it should be present, lacking any overarching national vision, goals, or guidance .....47
  - 2. Second, yet, when it is present, the federal transportation program takes an outdated approach to the challenges of today .....49
  - 3. Third, the lack of a 21st century approach to government means the program is underperforming and failing to maximize efficiencies. ....53
- VI. The Policy Recommendations: A Transportation Agenda for a Prosperous America .....56
  - 1. The federal government should lead the national transportation program by developing a coherent national vision and identifying strategic national investments.....57
  - 2. The federal government should empower states and metropolitan areas to grow in sustainable ways .....63
  - 3. Optimize Washington’s own performance and that of its partners with a greater focus on outcomes, accountability, and transparency to maximize metropolitan prosperity.....68
  - 4. Funding for the federal program—both funding levels and sources—should only be considered after the reform ideas are put in place.....73
- VII. Conclusion .....76
- Endnotes.....78

